They are saying that they are the best candidates to represent the people, that they have the experience and the expertise to get things done, and that they will fight for the interests of the people.

The public may express, "We want transparency in election information."

Researchers may say, "We need accurate data for our analysis."

Political analysts might ask, "How can we predict election outcomes more

They are campaigning, fundraising, and meeting with voters. They are also developing policies and strategies to address the issues that are important to the voters.

> Political analysts build predictive models.

effectively?"

Researchers collect and analyze election data.

The public follows election news and discusses candidates.

The public can be frustrated by misinformation or biased reporting.

They need the votes of the people to win the election. They also need the support of the people to implement their policies and to improve the lives of their constituents.

They want the people to believe in them and to trust them to represent their interests. They also want the people to be inspired by their vision for the future.

They are thinking about how to win the election, how to get their message across to the voters, and how to improve the lives of their constituents.

POLITICAL JUGGERNAUTS: A QUANTITATIVE ANALYSIS OF CANDIDATES IN THE 2019 LOK SABHA ELECTIONS

Political analysts are curious about finding patterns.

The public might feel anxious or hopeful about election results.

They are feeling confident, determined, and optimistic. They are also feeling a sense of responsibility to their constituents.

Researchers feel the pressure to provide reliable data